Motivational Interviewing Seminar
Co-Sponsored by the
Capital Area Home Visiting Stakeholders Group

Clients often have reasons to do a health promoting behavior (stop smoking, decrease substance use, take prescribed medication, exercise, make appointments for care, follow a diet). They also have reasons to NOT do this same behavior. Because of these reasons for and against, clients will often resist direct advice to do the healthy behavior. A health care provider who has tools in addition to giving information or advice will likely see more client improvement.

Motivational interviewing is such a tool. The health care provider helps the client to develop reasons to change from his or her perspective. This counseling style has been compared to dancing (versus wrestling). Not only does the client feel more respected, he or she often creates more connection with the health goal. The health care provider is freed from shouldering the burden of change. This respects the reality of the answer to the question, “Who has to have the motivation to do the health promoting behavior, the health care provider or the client?”

You have clients. You know why the clients would do well to follow your advice. You can use this seminar to enhance your skills in helping the clients find their reasons to follow your advice.

This is a Free Event
